DADDARIO URGES CIA 'WATCHDOGS'

HARTFORD, June 6—(AP) U.S. Rep. Emilio Q. Daddario, D-Conn., proposed today that the Central Intelligence agency (CIA) be supervised by a congressional committee.

This step, he said, would guarantee that the United States can depend on institutions rather than on one man.

"Basically," Daddario said in a talk broadcast by Hartford radio station WTIC, "we need an intelligence organization — and here the word 'organization' is important, for we must produce the information on which policy is based.

"This is not a matter for occasional decisions by any one man—it can be produced by hard, unrelenting effort and with careful and detailed attention to all areas that might affect policy."

Daddario said he felt personally that "we can do much of the necessary intelligence work without the huge building that is being constructed for CIA in Virginia, that we can do it without much of the publicity that now accompanies its efforts and that we can do it with thorough public understanding and comprehension without jeopardizing the necessary secrecy."

He said he agreed "fervently with the feeling that sources and methods of our intelligence agencies must be shrouded in the deepest secrecy. The importance of a security-proof intelligence system is a prime requisite."
